

Uncovering History: Archaeological Investigations At The Little Bighorn

The Battle of the Little Bighorn, also known as Custer's Last Stand, is one of the most well-known and controversial events in American history. On June 25, 1876, Lieutenant Colonel George Armstrong Custer and the 7th Cavalry Regiment were defeated by a combined force of Lakota, Cheyenne, and Arapaho warriors. Custer and all of his men were killed in the battle, and the defeat was a major turning point in the Indian Wars.

In the years since the battle, the Little Bighorn Battlefield has been the subject of extensive archaeological investigations. These investigations have uncovered a wealth of evidence that has helped to shed light on the events of that fateful day.

Archaeological Evidence

The archaeological evidence from the Little Bighorn Battlefield is extensive and varied. It includes the remains of the soldiers and horses, as well as the weapons, ammunition, and personal belongings that they left behind. The evidence also includes the remains of the Native American warriors who fought in the battle, as well as the horses and weapons that they used.

One of the most important pieces of evidence from the battlefield is the location of the soldiers' bodies. The bodies were found in a variety of locations, indicating that the battle was a chaotic and fluid event. The location of the bodies also provides clues about the tactics that the soldiers used in the battle.

Another important piece of evidence from the battlefield is the weapons that were used by both sides. The soldiers were armed with Springfield rifles and Colt revolvers, while the Native Americans were armed with a variety of weapons, including bows and arrows, lances, and tomahawks. The weapons that were used provide clues about the tactics that both sides used in the battle.
