In her groundbreaking book Unmasking Autism: Discovering the New Faces of Neurodiversity, Dr. Devon Price argues that autism is not a disorder that needs to be cured, but rather a natural variation in human neurology. She draws on her own experiences as an autistic person, as well as the latest research, to challenge the myths and misconceptions that surround autism.

Dr. Price offers a new way of thinking about autism that focuses on the strengths and abilities of autistic people. She argues that autistic people are not simply disabled, but rather have unique ways of perceiving and experiencing the world. She also provides practical advice for parents, educators, and other professionals on how to support autistic people and help them reach their full potential.
